MIDNIGHT DEADLINE

Another AMAZING-MAN Adventure

By DUKE CAREY

BUSY in a rented laboratory, John Aman, known also as THE AMAZING-MAN and "The Green Mist" was being visited by Zona Henderson, his beautiful young assistant.

"My aunt," said Zona, "wants to go to Bermuda on an excursion boat."

"Good idea," Aman said absently.

"And I want to go with her," Zona added.

"Another good idea," Aman agreed.

"And you're coming along," Zona said casually.

"Impossible!" Aman didn't even take his eyes from the vial of green liquid he had just removed from a Bunsen burner. "I'm busy on that baffling chain of poison murders the Police Commissioner turned over to me."

"I say you're going with us," Zona insisted. "You've been promising me for months to take a rest."

Suddenly Aman set the small vial in a rack and turned to Zona. "I'll go," he said, "if you'll give a story out to all the papers, saying we're making the trip to see a scientist down there about this peculiar poison."

"But John!" Zona's face was troubled. "That would be inviting those killers, as the cops say, tipping them off!"

"That's just what I want," Aman said cryptically. "Take it or leave it."

"It looks like anything but a rest," Zona sighed. "but you win," and she left the laboratory.

ON the afternoon before the great luxury excursion boat was due in Bermuda the next day, the glass-enclosed Tropical Garden with its vast swimming pool was crowded with merry-makers. Aman and Zona were lounging in deck chairs close to the pool when a scream rang out through the laughter and talk around them. Aman sprang from his seat, went over and watched while the rigid form of a girl in an awning-striped bathing suit was taken from the pool. A few minutes later he was in earnest conversation with the captain and ship's physician.

"She didn't drown," the man of medicine said after a hurried examination, "looks more like heart failure."

"And you'll find that her heart was stopped by a peculiar kind of poison," Aman told the doctor.

"That means we'll have to call off the masked ball arranged for tonight," the captain said, but Aman voiced a violent protest.

"If you want to catch that murderer, by all means let the masked ball go on as arranged," he protested.

"But with the killers loose here on the boat," the captain cried out, then broke off. "How did those men poison that girl anyhow?"

"I'll tell you before midnight tonight," Aman assured him, if you'll just let that ball go on as planned.

"I want you to announce to all and sundry that you'll wear a shepherdess costume at the ball this evening," Aman told Zona when he joined her after leaving the ship's officers.

"More mystery," Zona said. "I wish we hadn't come on this trip." Together they went to obtain their costumes from the purser. Aman chose a gaudy pirate's outfit and threw it over his arm, then led Zona out on deck. "Be sure we let all the passengers see these costumes if we can," he admonished the girl.

"And now," he told her, when they were opposite the door of her stateroom, "I want you to secretly get a domino costume from the purser and tell him to be sure not to rent the one you have there to anyone else."

DESPITE the doctor's announcement that the dead girl had been a victim of heart failure to cover up the murder, her death cast a pall of gloom over the ball that evening. She had been very popular among the passengers.

Cautioning Zona to stay away from him during the evening, Aman mixed with the crowd and showed himself everywhere. At eleven thirty-five, he met the captain, who in spite of Aman's mask, knew him by the pirate's costume.

"How about that midnight deadline you set yourself?" the officer asked, with just a trace of scepticism in his voice.

"I think I can promise you a solution even before that time," Aman answered. He had caught sight of a man in the costume of a Zabri Island native, and the man was watching him narrowly through thick glasses that could be seen through the eyeholes in his mask. The man was holding a long cigarette-holder. Deliberately Aman left the captain and walked along the deck to a shaded spot, then stood looking out over the water.

HE had been there only a moment when he felt something like a pin prick in his back. He whirled, leaped with lightning speed to where the man in the costume of the Zabri Islander was standing after having followed him on deck. He grasped the little man by the shoulders and then jerked the mask from his face.

"You're smart," the man conceded with an insane laugh, "but you're not quick enough. You'll be dead from the poison I shot into you—dead in less than a minute!"

"You're wrong," Aman told him. "I've already analyzed that poison, and taken an antidote that makes it harmless to me. That's why I let you shoot it into me."

"Come on, Mr. Aman, tell us how you did it, how you caught the killer," the captain insisted, after the little man had been locked up in the ship's brig.

"I knew the poisoners were operating in New York," Aman answered. "And that when they read the story Zona gave the papers they would follow us. The man was really very foolish to wear that Zabri Island costume, for that's where the poison came from. All I had to do was get in his way after taking the antidote, for I knew whoever killed that girl would be after me. You see, he was nearsighted, and the girl was wearing a bathing suit just like Zona's. And then, the cigarette holder—"

"Yes, what did that have to do with it?" the ship doctor asked.

"Everything. He used it as a blow-gun to shoot that little dart with. The dart itself was soluble and would dissolve from body heat in about a minute. And now, if you'll excuse me I want to dance with Miss Henderson—after I wire the New York police to round up the rest of that poison gang."

"It's about time we danced," Zona said with a touch of malice in her voice. "I came down here for a rest."

The index cards presented here were prepared by the Owner of this book, known modestly at the web sites where he participates simply as JVJ. His collection of Golden Age comics is formidable, and his knowledge of the body of work of Golden Age publishing is unmatched. So is his generosity in loaning his collection out to a trusted body of people who scan them for sharing with the greater community.

This card, part of an catalog of his collection, contains credits for books which were published in a time when credits were not universally given. Some of this information is available nowhere in print or on the internet.

The scanner of this book, narfstarr, is a prolific contributor to the websites mentioned in the issues fact sheet, as well as at The Grand Comics Database (www.comics.org), one of the pre-eminent sources for comic book data.
